Dear Ms. Monroe:

If you've been worrying about climate change, worry no more. Here's an organization actually hoping for climate change. From CJAD News out of Montreal:

While scientists are saying climate change could seriously harm our planet, the CEO of Hydro-Quebec says it's good for business.

During an announcement of a joint Canada-US global warming research project, Éric Martel said the phenomenon could prove profitable.

Martel said that sometime around 2050 rainfall is expected to increase in Quebec, especially in the northern region of the province where the utility has its main dams.

"I see the changes from climate change positively. Water is our oil" Martel said.

With the increased precipitation more water will be rushing through the hydroelectric dams "allowing us to become a leading exporter, and we know it pays for Quebec to export."

The head of the crown corporation was in Boston Sunday to announce a $100,000 investment over two years in a climate change think tank located here in Montreal.

The research initiative will be spearheaded by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) of Cambridge, Massachusetts.
