When I retired from the Navy in 1984 the Navy would have moved me and my family to anywhere in the U.S. We chose New Hampshire because it is truly unique and its natural beauty is breathtaking and inspiring.

Traveling along I-93 in the North Country simply makes you feel good. It feels like home.

Installing power towers when there are alternatives available would be an irreversible desecration of natural beauty - gone forever.

The sales pitch that it would create jobs is a myth. These kinds of complex construction projects are done by specialized companies who will import the skills they need until completion. Then they will be gone.

A gas line project in Minnesota got a similar pitch several years ago and the locals learned too late they weren't qualified.

I was raised in New Jersey, the land of overhead wires. Very few go there for the scenery.

Another reason we settled here was the people. Independent, community-oriented folks who take pride in their surroundings. Just take a random drive.

I understand the governor is in favor of it. I wonder what his position would be if it ran through Waterville Valley.
