I am writing because the proposed path of the huge towers through the national forest will be destroying some of the most beautiful parts of NH that attract visitors to NH. It is these tourists, and tourist dollars that go to the General Fund that is distributed to the towns around the state. It is my opinion that there will be a decrease in the number of visitors if the natural beauty is diminished due to manmade towers that dominate the landscape. There are already wind towers on several of the smaller mountain tops that are pretty ugly, but these do not compare to the towers for Northern Pass, which does nothing for the state of NH, delivering energy to southern New England. It seems, then, that NH is the big loser, forever compromising natural areas that have been a draw for tourists, not only from the US, but from all over the world. It seems that once again it is a corporate winner, and a loser for natural areas, and, ultimately, the citizens of the state.
