You have enough comments explaining that Northern Pass does not serve New Hampshire's best interests. The impact of the above-ground towers on tourism, possibly on health, and on the people who live close by could be lessened dramatically if the WHOLE Northern Pass were buried underground. Will that be costly? Yes. The initial capital investment would be quite high, but Eversource will be recouping its investment and making a profit in the long run and can well afford to do this (bury the lines). All it takes is money. It is unconscionable that they could prevent so much of the detrimental side effects of this project by burying it but have been, to date, unwilling to do so because they do not want to invest the extra resources. Commercial interests are not the only consideration here. Give some thought to the public good.
