New Hampshire is known as an outdoor playground. The Northern Pass infringes on New Hampshire's reputation as a scenic state where the best activities are found outdoors. Driving through western Massachusetts the view is marred by power lines and giant windmills, we should not auction off our state's beauty for a quick buck, that is something that we will never be able to reclaim.

The North Country of New Hampshire is one of the last largely untouched spots in New England. The towns there survive through tourism, not temporary line jobs. What will become of these towns when people stop visiting them? Will we leave them to die?

Getting cheaper power to Boston is not the responsibility of New Hampshire. Who is even to say how much power would be sent to Massachusetts during the winter months when it is needed most? Isn't the draw on power greatest in Canada in the winter?
